The International Journal of Nautical Archaeology covers all aspects of nautical archaeological research, exploring humankind's use and development of water transport from prehistoric to the recent past. The IJNA keeps readers abreast of the latest discoveries, excavations, techniques and theoretical approaches. Archaeologist and other scholars will find the closely-dated collections of artefacts from shipwrecks especially valuable in developing a wider understanding of chronological typologies and material culture. The material covered by the journal ranges from shipwrecks to maritime landscapes and aims to encourage a broader appreciation of our maritime past within its wider context.

The Nautical Archaeology Society is dedicated to advancing education in nautical archaeology at all levels; to improving techniques in excavating, conservation and reporting; and to encouraging the participation of members of the public at all stages. The NAS is a non-government organisation formed to further interest in our underwater cultural heritage. We are a registered charity based in the United Kingdom, but with strong links to sister organisations around the world.
